(PYY-G) and peptide
YY-(pancreatic) polypeptide-(PP)-like immunoreactivity (PYY-LI) in the submaxillary gland was investigated by light and electron immunocytochemistry. The submaxillary gland of the rat was found to contain two distinct neuronal populations, one population in the submaxillary nerve trunk and the other in the submaxillary nerve ganglion. Both populations contain PYY and PYY-G immunoreactivity. PYY and PYY-G were localized in axon terminals in the submaxillary ganglion. The axon terminals contained flattened synaptic-like contacts with unlabelled dendrites. On the other hand, colocalization studies demonstrated that PYY colocalized with PYY-G in the same axon terminals. PYY, PYY-G and PP-LI were also present in intramuscular nerve terminals.

Furthermore, an electron microscopic (EM) study was undertaken in order to determine whether the neuronal populations expressing PYY and PYY-G have any anatomical relationship to those containing PYY, PYY-G and PP. The EM study revealed that the majority of the PYY and PYY-G immunoreactive axon terminals in the submaxillary ganglion are not part of ganglion cell bodies, but are intrinsic to the axons of the submaxillary nerve. These data suggest that, while PYY and PYY-G could derive from the edd6d56e20
