These small products include mobile phones, tablet computers, and music players, to name a few. While this is generally true, the portability and convenience associated with these products often comes at a cost in power usage. Generally, the more portable a product is, the more power it uses. For example, a mobile phone or tablet computer needs to be powered by a battery or other power source, which needs to be recharged. This is a considerable inconvenience if the mobile phone or tablet computer is not readily available. Since the product needs to be powered on at all times, the battery or other power source cannot be sized to provide a large amount of power when the product is being used. As such, a product that is always powered on, such as a mobile phone or tablet computer, may only be able to last for a few hours before needing to be recharged. Furthermore, portability is often sacrificed in the pursuit of simplicity. For example, many mobile phones feature a "sleep" feature that turns off the display, processor, and other parts of the mobile phone when the phone is not being actively used. The user must manually turn the mobile phone back on whenever the user wants to use the mobile phone. Accordingly, there is a need for an improved way to provide power to a product.
