As Andreessen said about a bunch of other companies doing the same: "We thought of two of them and we built a company around them." May 26, 2017 We took a look at how software is developed by over 150 large and small companies at the TechCrunch Disrupt SF Conference in 2015. Two of the most interesting trends in software development emerged: The dominance of Java over the last decade is fading, with JavaScript taking over as the language of choice for the majority of new server-side code. Java's been a language of choice for server-side code for a while, but thanks to the new Java 8 features, more developers are now giving Java a fresh, and increasingly popular, look. Large companies aren't spending more on software, they're spending less. Thanks in part to their less expensive, cloud-based options, software budgets are shrinking at large companies. GitHub is generally viewed as the most popular code sharing platform today. In 2015, though, GitHub was surpassed by BitBucket, which is attracting more attention in part because Microsoft already uses it as the default code hosting option for Visual Studio.
