Équipe BMS This invention relates to a process for the production of alcohols using the aldehyde dehydrogenase (ALDH) system for the oxidation of certain reactants. The term "alcohols" as used in this specification is intended to refer to alcohols alone and to mixtures of alcohols with other oxygenated compounds such as ethers, esters and the like. It is well known that aldehydes are relatively stable compared with the corresponding carboxylic acids and that aldehydes are derived from carboxylic acids by the action of oxidising agents such as permanganate. The aldehydes, whether generated by this process or by direct oxidation of the carboxylic acid, are normally reduced to form alcohols by the action of a reducing agent. The conventional processes for the production of alcohols by oxidation of aldehydes are carried out by the action of alkaline or alkaline earth metal salts of heavy metal halides, such as, sulphate, chloride and the like. These processes usually employ the action of alkaline metal salts of a halide of copper, manganese, iron, cobalt, nickel, molybdenum, vanadium, chromium and the like on aldehydes and produce mixtures of alcohols, the predominant alcohol being that with the shortest chain. These processes are generally carried out in a slurry phase in the presence of relatively large amounts of heavy metal salts and produce large amounts of the corresponding heavy metal salts. The disposal of the waste matter produced presents a serious problem. Attempts have been made to avoid the use of heavy metal salts or to recover the waste metal from the oxidation mixture, but these have not been particularly successful.
