Attackers in the U.S. are increasingly exploiting IoT vulnerabilities in home entertainment systems, including connected TVs, media streamers, and security cameras, as well as connected home-automation devices, according to a new report from security firm Vectra, the same group that revealed a hacker was exploiting networked refrigerators and was able to remotely take control of them on a local network. The attack surface for connected IoT devices extends far beyond home devices, such as connected TVs, because devices are increasingly connecting to the Internet via Wi-Fi networks and by using home broadband services like AT&T's AT&T U-verse TV, which you can use to remotely control your TV in your home. Not only can attackers hack these devices, but they can also exploit them to attack websites in order to steal information that gets passed via the home Internet service. And while many connected home devices have been showing up as zero-day vulnerabilities on OSINT sites like Bleeping Computer, exploiting IoT vulnerabilities is still a far more effective attack strategy for real-world attackers that already have their pick of zero-day vulnerabilities. To get a better sense of just how pervasive the IoT attack surface is, The IoT Security Threat Landscape: The IoT Threat Landscape and Impact, a report from Vectra, analyzed more than 4,000 of the top 10 product vulnerabilities in the security industry – as ranked by various security firms – since April 2016. Vectra researchers found that IoT devices are particularly vulnerable because attackers are able to quickly find zero-day vulnerabilities that they can use in attacks. The researchers found that an astounding 99% of connected devices contained one or more security vulnerabilities, and in some cases, devices were able to exploit multiple vulnerabilities simultaneously.
