Crack DownloadDiffusion mediated electrochemical cell at a liquid-liquid interface: the case of diffusion-controlled corrosion. We demonstrate that the dominant corrosion mechanism at a liquid-liquid interface is controlled by the solute mass transfer and the diffusivity of the substrate. In an electrochemical cell, the substrate, H₂O, is measured to be responsible for the dissolution of the electrolyte and of the two electrodes, the cathode or the anode (in the case of a potential difference). We show that, whereas the mass transfer of H₂O from the bulk solution of the cathode to the electrolyte is controlled by the H⁺ transfer from the substrate to the electrolyte, the dissolution of the substrate is controlled by a diffusion coefficient inversely proportional to the substrate concentration. The net corrosion, the difference of the amounts of substrate dissolved at the cathode and the anode, is thus controlled by the diffusion coefficient of the substrate. For a given potential difference and given diffusion coefficient of the substrate, the concentration of the substrate is shown to be the only criterion to evaluate the corrosion rate at the electrode interface. The diffusion coefficient of the substrate, which can be obtained experimentally with the use of the volumetric method, is shown to be independent of the operation potential and the pH of the substrate solution.⁵ DIY Activities To Rejuvenate Your Soul If you've ever asked me to pinpoint a specific day to give you 'that feeling' in your life, if there was a day where it all just hit you right in the middle of your face, where you felt this great sense of melancholy well-up, then it would be Monday morning. Monday morning is the beginning of a new week. Oh God, how I hate new weeks. Monday morning is the beginning of the end of summer, the beginning of the beginning of fall, the beginning of the beginning of winter. We can start to feel its clutches, the winds beginning to pick up. But it's not the end of summer or summer's end, and the leaves haven't turned, it's not winter, it's just the beginning of fall. Monday morning is just the beginning of fall. So, with that in mind, here's a list of some easy DIY activities to transform Monday morning, from feeling like the beginning of fall, to feeling like the beginning of spring, or maybe even the beginning of love.
