and cyclic AMP in rat mandibular condylar cartilage. Fourteen rats were used for the first part of a study of the metabolism of cyclic AMP (cAMP) in mandibular condylar cartilage. Rats were labeled with 1-14C-adenosine and 3Hguanosine for three consecutive 12-h periods and the kinetic parameters of the cAMP-accumulation process were derived. Adenine nucleotides plus a cyclic AMP-like compound were identified and analyzed by high performance liquid chromatography. In the second part of this study, one group of rats received injections of hypoxanthine and in another group, injections of 3H-hypoxanthine followed by 14C-hypoxanthine. One day after the third injection of 3H-hypoxanthine, the animals were killed and the mandibular condylar cartilage was excised and frozen. The formation of 3H-hypoxanthine plus 14
