The combined diversity of the Vκ and VH gene families encoding anti-dinitrophenyl (DNP) antibodies in the mouse and the human is described. Thirty-six VH and 25 Vκ genes were amplified by long-distance polymerase chain reaction from the spleens of mice immunized with the DNP hapten. Functional V genes were identified using a sensitive solid-phase technique. Thirty-seven VH and 37 Vκ genes were sequenced and analyzed. The human VH repertoire shares, albeit to a lesser extent, with the mouse repertoire a similar feature of the "germline" repertoire, i.e. a small collection of VH sequences that are ubiquitously used in the rearrangements of the heavy chains of both natural and monoclonal antibodies. The clonality of the mouse and human repertoires was also studied by amplification of the respective V gene families with a set of random 12-mer primers. A comparison of the V gene usage among the mouse and the human repertoires revealed a substantial difference in the skewing of the germline gene repertoire. The analysis of the V gene repertoires of inbred strains of mice and the human repertoire suggests that the propensity of a mouse to develop antibodies to DNP is a function of the variation of the V gene repertoire. The same strain of mice, when immunized with a different antigen, may b7e8fdf5c8
