Comparison of the effects of anesthetics and analgesics on the induction of analgesia by naloxone. Experiments were conducted to determine whether naloxone, the putative endogenous opiate antagonist, has analgesic properties by itself. In addition, the effect of naloxone on the analgesic properties of morphine, meperidine, and methadone was examined. Naloxone did not reverse the analgesic effects of a single i.v. injection of morphine or methadone; however, it reversed analgesia in cats induced by two or more injections of these opiates. Naloxone also reversed the analgesia produced by an i.v. injection of meperidine in cats, although it appeared to decrease the effectiveness of meperidine in certain tests. The results of this study indicate that naloxone has analgesic properties by itself and that it is more potent against the pain produced by multiple injections of opiates than against the pain produced by a single injection. This appears to be an important difference between naloxone and opiates. Cost of living hits home for Pats What the heck is going on in New England anyway?
