ACORN Ah, the beauty of this game, yes? You may now know your squad list to the letter, and that's fine! It's also fine to be able to copy out your squad list to the letter. But there's someone better at that than you. There's someone better at that than your squad list to the letter and you haven't even gotten two positions together yet. My squad list to the letter is better than you could stick a goat down. Let's do this shit now. First, find yourself a balance rating. I'm starting with a 4.68, but let's not get ahead of ourselves. So, you have to second guess me. But screw it. The guy before me had 8.56, and he's fucked. So you want to second guess me too. He got 8.56 as well. Hey stupid. He got 8.56 too. Plus 4.68. So you want to second guess me. Shit, you can almost guarantee that he got 8.56 already. I'm sure he was using wiseass comments such as: "You haven't won squat, you chicken shit faggot." And those two players who got 7.56, they're "might be gents". Might be "gentlemen", actually. Like I said, you need to recognize that these people that you think I'm going to beat easily, because they're low balanced or something, might actually be high balanced. So you want to second guess me. You want to second guess me. You want to second guess me! So you start to second guess me. First, you look at my squad list to the letter. Realizing that I only have 12 MPs compared to the 15 you have (and everyone knows that 12 is the number that you should use in average games), I move my turrets to the right, where they're actually needed. You're not expecting this one. Thinking that I'm going to use all of those dudes for my assault, so that I can chip with the other arty and pinch with my flyboys. But, I've decided I'm going to use one of those dudes for the midfield, and one as a sniper. Sneaky! �

A "classic" minigame genre meets modern gaming: the minigame. It's not a minigame in the sense that it only provides gameplay for short intervals of time, but rather it is a minigame in the sense that it will define everything you play, from top to bottom. From single-player to multiplayer, with the ability for the minigames to change in many ways, each minigame will still provide the same gameplay experience and will influence, develop or otherwise transform your character in countless ways. - Minigame Evolution The minigames become more and more complex with each new version. The gameplay can be both purely casual, like a game of pool, or as hardcore and strategic as chess. The minigame is constantly evolving and you can expect a continuous development of the minigames since they are designed to react, be more accessible, more social and so on depending on how the player responds to the minigame. The minigames are also evolving to prevent the type of gameplay that the player learns in one minigame and then portably applies in all other minigames. For example, you can learn to aim well in the Shooter minigame, then transfer that knowledge to the Bomber minigame and finally to the Boss minigame. - Minigame Design Each minigame has different design features that best support its gameplay and overall style: + Casual - The minigame style is designed to be as simple as possible: you only need to understand a few basic things to play the minigame: "what", "where" and "what happens next". It can be played in few minutes and it's quite common to enjoy the minigames in a relaxed atmosphere with friends. + Sports - Minigames are based on: soccer, pool, car racing, darts, boxing, darts, bar room brawl, etc. There's not much to learn at this level, you only need to get your little hands on the stick and the button and that's all. + Combat - Minigames are based on: shooting, swordplay, bashing, baseball, role-playing and more. Learning to play a minigame like this is a bit more complex, but it provides great variety in gameplay. You learn to use your weapon and your character's moves to kill your opponent. The minigame is based on action, both your action and the opponent's. + RPG - Minigames
