However, this fact has rarely been reported in the field of medicine. Therefore, we examined how often physicians make mistakes while assessing patients in both routine practice and procedures. We determined the cases of incorrect diagnosis, and found that patients with underlying diseases tend to make more errors than those without. Physicians' diagnostic confidence was also lower than in general practice, especially for life-threatening diseases. The present study shows that physicians rarely have good confidence in their own diagnoses in a clinical setting and that they should pay more attention to their diagnosis skills.
