Influence of anesthetic doses of fentanyl on spinal cord nociceptive and sympathetic stimulation-induced vasoconstriction in man. The influence of anesthetic doses of fentanyl on spinal cord stimulation-induced vasoconstriction was studied in subjects with and without hypertension. The vasoconstriction was quantitated by the lowering of blood pressure induced by the intravenous infusion of physiologic saline. Stimulation periods of 20 min, including titration intervals of 15 min, were used. Vasoconstriction induced by electrical stimulation applied to the sciatic nerve and the sural nerve was not different in normotensives with chronic pain and normotensives without pain; it also did not differ between subjects with and without hypertension. In subjects with hypertension, vasoconstriction induced by electrical stimulation applied to the sural nerve was significantly greater than that seen in normotensives. Fentanyl reduced the vasoconstriction induced by electrical stimulation at the sciatic nerve to basal values in all the subjects. Fentanyl also reduced the level of vasoconstriction induced by electrical stimulation at the sural nerve in all the subjects with hypertension. In normotensive subjects, fentanyl reduced only the vasoconstriction induced by stimulation of the sural nerve. Fentanyl in a dose of 20-30 micrograms/kg i.v. is capable of blocking in man both tonic and phasic sympathetic vasoconstriction. Thursday, June 30, 2017 THE MEN OF THE KNIGHT'S GUARD I can't think of a better wedding gift. I have spent my life in a car; then I had a family of my own, and now my final days are spent alone. My time is running out, my life is over. I still get to family gatherings, go to parks, mow the lawns and visit with my neighbors. They are much more in love with me than I care. I have confessed my quiet ways to a girlfriend who often pities my loneliness. She takes me to a local coffee shop and lets me play checkers with her. At the age of 45, I sit for 45 minutes with a person who hates me. That may be a requirement for a lasting friendship. Either way, I have just been excused. The loneliness is not quite so bad when it is shared. Every evening I try to imagine what my life would be like if I hadn't grown up without a father. I wonder how much love is really missing from my life. We are very good friends. I never expected that at my age. I have her to thank for that. She would come to my apartment and we would talk, laugh, play games. I am still amazed at the simple pleasures that she shares with me. We have traveled a long way together and we are still together. Her friendship was one of the nicest gifts I ever received. In life, there is a special advantage in having a friend who lives nearby. It is called the Philadelphia Knights of Columbus. The Knights were the oldest and largest fraternal society in America. I joined the Knights during my sophomore year in college in 1968. As a member of my local, I attended local business meetings, my first political convention and national conventions. The Knights promoted common values and shared goodwill among all ethnic groups. We had charity balls, luncheons, banquets, concerts. We built a Catholic cathedral on my city's outskirts, a Catholic school, and a clubhouse. I learned a lot about politics through my dealings with the Knights, and I have never wavered in my faith. At one of our most famous conventions, in 1972, I addressed the delegates, telling them my experiences as
