Field of the Invention This invention relates to brushless DC motors, and more particularly, to a method and system for actively detecting the position of a rotatable rotor of a brushless DC motor. 2. Description of Related Art Brushless direct current motors (hereinafter BDC motors) are becoming increasingly common in a variety of applications, such as, but not limited to, motors in heating, ventilation, air conditioning (HVAC) systems, window opening and closing systems, and robotic systems. These systems require high torque at low speeds and variable speed control. BDC motors provide a high degree of efficiency compared to other types of motors, such as induction and brushed DC motors. A typical BDC motor includes a stator and a rotor. The stator typically includes an outside surface, inside surface, and an air gap between the outside surface and the inside surface. The rotor is rotatably mounted with respect to the stator and is typically coupled to an output shaft of the BDC motor. The output shaft is coupled to an output device, such as a mechanism that performs an operation, such as, but not limited to, opening and closing a window, rotating a robotic arm, and operating a HVAC unit. BDC motors typically include a position detection circuit that generates a position signal based on an indication of the position of the rotor with respect to the stator. The position detection circuit typically includes a Hall device that senses the position of the rotor and generates an electrical pulse or pulses based on the position of the rotor. By monitoring the electrical pulses, the position of the rotor may be determined. The electrical pulses may be generated based on the rotation of a magnet that is mounted on the rotor and a permanent magnet that is attached to the stator. A typical position detection circuit includes a Hall device, such as a hall element, that senses the position of the rotor and generates an electrical pulse when the rotor passes over a magnet that is attached to the stator. When the Hall device senses the magnet, the Hall device generates a current pulse that is provided to the position detection circuit. The position detection circuit is connected to a control circuit that processes the current pulse to determine the position of the rotor. The control circuit may include, for example, a microprocessor and memory that are programmed to calculate the position of the rotor.
