Brown, 725 F.3d 1128, 1135 (8th Cir. 2013). We conclude that neither of those circumstances is present here.

We first hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion when it imposed a 25-year mandatory minimum sentence for the § 924(c) offense. The district court's reasoning on this point was carefully stated. Applying the categorical approach, the district court observed that Banks' § 924(c) offense involved an attempt to inflict bodily injury with a dangerous weapon in furtherance of a crime of violence. The court noted that these elements were present in every case in which § 924(c) is charged and that it was not aware of any Tenth Circuit case that had held that such conduct was not a crime of violence. The district court therefore held that the elements of § 924(c) were present in Banks' offense, and concluded that the 25-year mandatory minimum applied. We agree with the district court that Banks' crime of violence conviction under § 924(c) meets the elements-based approach. Banks was convicted of using a dangerous weapon to inflict bodily injury, and the government has not suggested that this conviction was somehow invalid. Thus, this case is governed by the Supreme Court's decision in
