The effect of moisture on polymeric materials and the effect of thermal changes of polymers on the moisture absorption characteristics of the polymers are well known. When a polymer material is exposed to a moisture or water-containing atmosphere the moisture may take up or absorb moisture to expand or swell the polymer molecules and bonds and cause deterioration of the polymer material. The degree of such deterioration is referred to herein as the "relative humidity" of the environment in which the polymer is stored. The overall or cumulative effect of water-containing atmospheres can be referred to as "moisture susceptibility". Moisture absorption by polymer is due to an affinity between water and the polymers molecules. The degree of water absorption is determined by the temperature and the amount of water present. The greater the temperature and the amount of water present the greater is the degree of water absorption by the polymer molecules. Moisture absorption is a reversible process and the degree of moisture absorption may be described as the degree of "moisture regain" of the polymer. Polymeric materials such as polyvinyl chloride, polyethylene and polypropylene may be processed into parts, toys, food containers and other articles, which are exposed to the environment and to water-containing atmospheres. When the parts, toys, food containers and other articles are exposed to moisture or water-containing atmospheres, the parts, toys, food containers and other articles will tend to absorb moisture and the volume of the articles will expand. The volume of the articles will continue to increase until a steady state condition is 6d1f23a050
