Hillary Clinton has been in politics for nearly 40 years. We've seen her grow, and she's certainly found her flaws. And yet, even after all these years, she's still the same person who, in 1992, said, "If elected, I commit to make a prime-time television-broadcast address to the nation on the first Monday in September announcing my candidacy for the Presidency of the United States." She has not made a prime-time television-broadcast address to the nation, and she has not made a prime-time television-broadcast address to the nation. If she is going to do so, she should cancel her endless campaign schedule and spend the next few months working on her speech. It would be an opportunity for her to be the candidate who speaks from the heart, without preaching, and without criticizing others. It would also allow her to articulate in depth her vision of the United States and the role of government in American life. It's about time we heard from her. [Dana Milbank has been a columnist for The Washington Post for 20 years. His new book is "The Right Less Wrong: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Politics of the Alternative Right."] Share this article Link copied.
