At a time when an increasing number of smartphones and tablets and game consoles are starting to get both favorable gaming reviews and media coverage, and a growing number of games for more than just one platform (PS4 vs. Xbox One vs. PC, for example) are available, Diablo III is poised to make a splash that could benefit both the development and gaming industry. Of course, there were people who would say that Diablo III was a bad business decision: considering their cost, perhaps the game wouldn't have sold as many copies, perhaps it would have. I think that probably one of the game's most daring aspects was the degree to which it was willing to offer something like two and a half different pricing tiers, depending on your level and your progress. I don't know if you guys know it or not, but the name "Diablo" has become more culturally powerful than even you can possibly know. Ever since the release of Diablo II, folks have literally been lining up around the world and around the block to buy that game and play it in any way they can. And over the years, it has done much to establish itself among the pantheon of gaming gods, with increased sales and expansions on both sides. Even if the game fails to live up to its Diablo brand, it will probably be remembered for many more years to come as its own brand. It's fantastic when there is a game in the Diablo universe that can be separated off and enjoyed apart from the rest of it. Hell, even before Diablo III, there were Diablo II-only and Diablo III-only fans. They can enjoy Diablo III on its own, too, to an extent. And even if it is a commercial failure, it will still benefit the game industry and players as a whole.
